Jack kept his eyes on his paper, where he was drawing a plant. He didn't answer her.

Rosie elbowed Wolfie and gave him a wide-eyed look, the kind that said, Why isn't Jack helping?

"Ow, Rosie! What'd you do that for?" Wolfie was never any good at eye language.

"Never mind," she said. They didn't need Jack's help anyway.

Wolfie leaned over to look at Rosie's book and said, "Mrs. Marshall said we need a question about what beans need to grow."

"Yep," Rosie said. Wolfie had a habit of telling Rosie things she already knew. "So?" Wolfie said. "What's our question gonna be?"

"Easy—wherever you are!" said Gram. "Brainstorming is about starting anywhere. You write down all your ideas, whether they're good or bad."

- 26 -

Rosie looked sideways at Gram. "That's what Mrs. Marshall says. But why would I write down a bad idea?" "You never know," said Gram. "A bad idea could turn into a good one." "But I don't want bad ideas, Gram. I want a good idea, so I can write a good story."

Gram put her hands up. "I'm sure you know best, my little red Rose."

Rosie narrowed her eyes at Gram. That was what Gram said anytime Rosie started to argue. And as usual, it was the end of the argument.

Gram smiled at Rosie. "Just to get started, how about you look around and write down some of the things you see?" Rosie thought that sounded dumb, but she wasn't about to say so to Gram.

In the lobby, the walls were planets, and

Mama was a chaperone.
"Please stay with your group,"
she told Yasmin, Emma, Ali,
Zack, and Mason.
"Isn't space beautiful?" said
a lady in uniform. She told them her name was Ms. Simmons.

"Ready for an adventure?"
Emma's mom, Mrs. Winters, asked.
The scouts nodded. "Ready!"
They headed up a path into the trees. "What do you notice?"
Mrs. Winters asked.

"It's quiet," Yasmin said. "No cars honking. Nobody yelling."
Mrs. Winters smiled. "Yes, we're far from the city."
And far from my family, Yasmin
thought nervously.
Then they heard birds chirping.

"Emilio! Don't forget to bring your sweatshirt back home, mijo," she called.
 "¡Sí, mamá!" Emilio yelled back.
 My eyes widened. "You speak another language too?" I asked.
 Emilio nodded. "Yep! Spanish. My parents are more comfortable with it. They came from Mexico when I was a baby," he replied. "What about you?"
 "I speak Korean," I said.

"Cool! You should teach me some time," he said.
 I thought quietly for a minute. Emilio and I had a lot in common. We both spoke different languages and had different cultures. I wondered if he ever had any of the same thoughts I did.

"Did you ever wish you weren't . . . different?" I finally asked.
 Emilio stopped walking and looked at me. He tapped a finger on his chin like he was thinking hard.

"Sometimes," he finally replied. "When I first started at Andaleen, some kids thought the things I liked were weird—like the shows I watched or the food I brought to school. It bothered me at first, but then I realized they're just missing out. You know what I mean?"
 I nodded. Emilio's experience sounded a lot like my first day at Andaleen, but I'd Mom laughed. "Now you can barely touch your toes," she teased.

 "Hey! I can touch my toes," Dad protested, crossing his arms. "Let me show you something very special." He walked over to the closet and took a box from the top shelf, then carried it over to me and took off the lid. "Ta-da!"
 I leaned closer, and my eyes widened. The box was full of medals, trophies, and belts.
 "Wow!" I said. "All of these are yours?"
 I grabbed one of the trophies from the box. A figure at the top of the trophy was mid-kick. The words First Place Advanced Tournament were engraved on the base.
 "Yep," Dad replied. "I told you I was pretty good." He stood up and did a few punches in the air. "Hana, dul, set, net!" he shouted, counting in Korean.
 I had never seen my dad look so serious. He looked really cool doing the punches.
